D. Fayzieva : Environmental Health in Central Asia : The Present and Future (Advances in Ecological Sciences) before purchasing it in order to gage whether or not it would be worth my time, and all praised Environmental Health in Central Asia : The Present and Future (Advances in Ecological Sciences):

This book provides information on how environmental conditions in Central Asia have been affected by anthropogenic activity and reviews research carried out during the last decades on the impact of the environment on the health of the region's people. The contributors aim is to promote a better understanding of current environmental health problems in the area and to prompt joint multidisciplinary research by local scientists and their colleagues from other countries. Such research could lift the veil on numerous environmental processes, which negatively or positively influence health, and contribute to the development of effective protective arrangements.
